No Hard Coal Is Being Mined as Strike Result

The sixth week of the coal strike was marked by an increase in soft coal production, the output for the week being estimated at 4,500,000 tons, the Geological Survey announced last night. Production of anthracite, however, remains practically zero.

The increase has been general in those districts not affected by the strike and is especially marked in the southern and middle Appalachians and western Kentucky.

The increase in shipments from the mines is making smaller inroads upon stocks of coal in storage, the survey's report states.
